

The Wolves Are Here

by
Phil Rasmussen

According to author Dave Grossman, people can be divided into one of three groups:

- Wolves,
- Sheepdogs
- Sheep

To better understand Grossman's assertion, we need to first understand the definitions for each group.

Most animal species, including sheep, cluster together in herds, flocks, packs, schools, swarms, etc. Clustering is done for a number of reasons such as:

- Feeding
- Mating
- Socializing
- Protection in numbers
- Synergistic energy
- Survival of the most fit
- Collective vigilance
- Anti-predatory behavior
- Being relatively low on the food chain

Since most people are kind, good, and don't know how to deal with evil or danger, they are like sheep. They are placid, docile, meek and compliant: follow the crowd: and are easily manipulated.

Being a sheep is not bad. Most members of each species behave as sheep. However, being a sheep does not mean that you do nothing. Throughout history, people have interacted to.

- work together for food and comfort,
- socialize for companionship,

- mate to preserve the species,
- for protection
- be energized by those around them

This is the nature of humans as discussed by Grossman.

Are you a sheep – placid and easily manipulated?

God, and Jesus often refer to us as sheep because sheep represent purity and innocence. We are also compared to sheep for nine other reasons as discussed on this link: <https://momremade.com/god-compares-us-to-sheep/>. If you are a sheep, you need to trust God for your safety. But trust is not the only thing that God calls upon you to do.

Surrounding all sheep are predators waiting to pounce, kill and feed on the animal.

Grossman calls the human world predators, Wolves. Wolves exist in the shadows outside the easily penetrable perimeter that surrounds the sheep. They are sociopaths who commit violent crimes or ignore moral or ethical boundaries with impunity. They take advantage of the sheep's tendency to be inexperienced with evil, unprepared for attack, and caught flat-footed when a crisis arises.

Wolves can act independently (lone wolf) or as a pack. Regardless, both types seek out the weakest and then devour the sheep up the food chain of victims.

There are two types of wolf packs. Most people are familiar with the most common wolf pack among people – the gangs that prey on both individuals, and communities. Their goal is to obtain money through fear and control of people.

The second type of pack is much like a gang but is not as easily recognizable as it stays hidden, out-of-sight. Its victims are individuals, communities/groups, and government. Their goal is power through intimidation and control over the people. This type of pack has been called various names such as “The Deep State,” “The New World Order,” etc. This pack's intent is to destroy the United States and cast everyone but a very select few into a pool of poverty.

Since our nation's beginning, individuals have protected the sheep from the wolves. In the Bible, these people were called shepherds. Their duties were to protect the sheep from predators, thieves, the environment, and to ensure that the sheep are well kept and healthy. In one case a shepherd (David) came forth to also protect his nation from the wolves of the Philistines.

Shepherds however were not only people but also dogs which vigilantly protected the sheep. Without question both man and dog would go after the predators.

In our society we call our shepherds, "Sheepdogs." They protect the sheep by vigilantly watch for evil lone wolfs and wolf packs, and responding accordingly. Their alertness and willingness to protect often keeps the wolves at bay. While possessing a capacity for violence, Sheepdogs also possess a moral compass, are trustworthy, gentle, and have a deep love for their fellow citizens.

Sheep find sheepdogs annoying when things are fine. Most people grumble about the police when they get a ticket for a traffic violation. But when a wolf attacks them, the complaining stops when the police stops the attack, catch the villous wolves and haul them off to jail. However their short-lived memory forgets about the attack and the grumbling returns.

The sheepdog's ordinary day-to-day vigilance is no longer sufficient to protect the sheep. It is not enough to protect the sheep from the lone wolf or the gang wolf pack, protection is also needed against the hidden, unseen, and foreign wolf packs bent on our destruction.

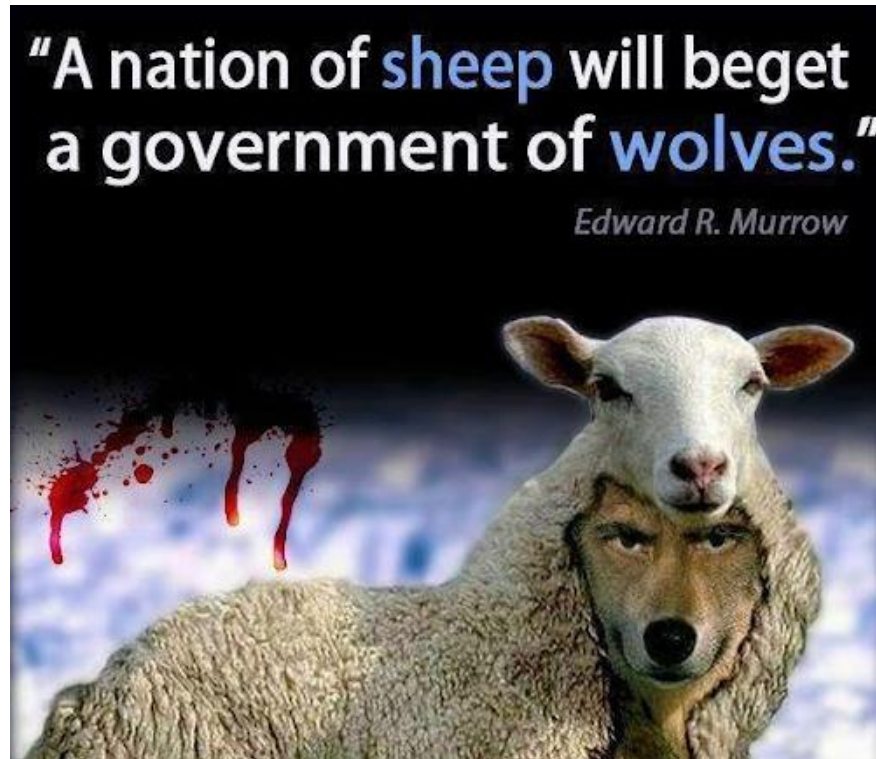

To protect against these wolf packs, Sheepdogs need additional strategic and tactical support. They need the sheep to also participate in their own protection.

In nature, herds and other clustering animals have their own sheepdogs. However every member of the group also has the responsibility to stay alert to danger and sound the alarm if it approaches. The difference between these groups and us is that while we possess the same instinct, it has been socially "bred" out of us. We have been repeatedly told, call 911, or similar action, and let them handle the problem. In other words we have surrendered our responsibility to the herd.

The Sheepdogs need you to take back your responsibility not only to your family but also to your community and nation.

The world needs people willing to face danger and stand up to the dishonesty and evil to save others and to preserve the fabric of our communities.

Are you going to let the Wolves feed on you and yours?
